

The Right To Unionise

Business people, and public employers, are organised - as businesses and public bodies

Most people aren't organised as workers

One Starting

Un-unionised, each worker is weak because the employer has many others doing the work and doesn't much need any one more... or any one less...

One Sacked

The Right – the Entitlement - To Unionise

Most work is industrialised. Most employers have many staff. They can get by without any one leaving, any one new, or any one they sack, with the rest working. Each is weak in the job deal with their employer not because the employer can replace them from the unemployed but because without them they still have all the others. And, with most work industrialised and most workforces unionized, there's the same unfair relationship in other jobs they might go to instead.

People shouldn't have to make their living on such unfair terms. It operates against anybody, whatever colour, gender, or nationality. They have the right to bargain with business people and public sector managers as equals, by unionising.

Employers Are Organised - Workers Should Be

Such power for employers from 'having many others' is not on. It just grows out of industrialising, it was never decided. People are entitled to respond by unionising. It's about more than pay and conditions. By getting equal to managers you become adults at work, with dignity, not minions. Being in a trade union should be normal, accepted, expected and respectable in everyday life and politics.

Business people dominate the majority in politics as well as work. Their work-based, trade-based organisation makes them 'the economy'. Because of that they dictate to progressive governments. And by owning most of the media they dominate political debate. And they often get to be the government, through their conservative parties. Yet they say we should not be involved in politics through our unions, just work and working conditions! No—we, the great majority, workers, are entitled to use our trade organisation too, to become 'players' in the economy, alongside business people and the state, and to build our political parties and power.

People need to convince each other of their right to unionise – and do it.
